MONROE COUNTY

More than 100 orange balloons drifted off into a pink-streaked sunset Wednesday evening as heavy hearts stayed grounded below.

Most everybody at First Baptist Church in High Falls knew Christian Burdette, the gregarious middle school boy who enjoyed chasing the bus with his dirt bike after school. Their shirts matched the balloons — orange, his favorite color.

“He packed more life in the little time he was here than some people who get to be 100 do,” Warren Burdette said at the balloon release in memory of his 12-year-old son. “I am in such pain right now I can hardly breathe.”

Christian drowned Tuesday at High Falls State Park, less than a mile down the road from the church. He was walking across the park’s tallest waterfall with his brother, 17-year-old James Burdette, when the two slipped and fell. James survived and had to be rescued by helicopter.

“The Lord was not surprised by what happened this week,” interim church Pastor Glen McCall said. “He was preparing us and we didn’t even know it.”

Christian had been baptized Aug. 6 after being moved by a service about salvation on the lake in late July.

He had been “adamant and persistent about being baptized,” church youth leader Jordan Harmon said.

Youngsters signed a white cross topped with Christian’s motocross helmet in the church parking lot.

“If they’ve got a motocross track in heaven, I guarantee he’s on it,” James said of his brother. “If they don’t, he’ll build them one.”

High Falls Park Superintendent Josh Purdy said the boy’s death was devastating to the park’s staff, who knew him well from his frequent visits, walking from his house nearby.

Christian was the second person to drown at that waterfall this year.

In May, 38-year-old Daniella Flanagan was walking on the rocks of the falls with her husband when she slipped and fell. Flanagan died from her injuries shortly after the fall.

Purdy said the deaths are prompting discussions about signage and how to make the park a safer place for visitors.

Other deaths at the falls include:
